

Assistant or Associate Professor of Broadcast Journalism
S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, Syracuse University

The Newhouse School seeks candidates for a tenured or tenure-track professor position beginning mid-August, 2008.

The successful candidate will have significant professional experience in television newscast producing, and producing or supervising the production of news content for new media. The candidate must demonstrate not just an understanding of, but a vision for, multi-platform storytelling. The person hired will have had experience working in multiple markets and/or a network, or other experience that adds up to a record of professional accomplishment in journalism. Strong ties to professional organizations and the industry are expected. Significant newsroom management experience is a plus.

Undergraduate and graduate courses the successful candidate could be asked to teach include producing and reporting for television and online, newswriting, news management and ethics. An advanced degree and teaching experience are preferred but not required.

This professor will teach five to six courses per year, produce professional work or research, advise students, and serve on department and school committees. Salary and rank are negotiable.

The Newhouse School attracts outstanding students and is a leading educator of persons who will work in public communications. More than 375 broadcast journalism majors are among the nearly 2000 undergraduate, masters and doctoral students. The School recently expanded into a new third building which includes a multi-media lab. The city of Syracuse offers excellent cultural and athletic resources, and an affordable cost of living. Syracuse is within a half-day's travel of New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Toronto, and Montreal, as well as the recreational areas of the Finger Lakes region and Adirondacks.

Syracuse University offers an excellent benefit package that includes tuition, retirement, comprehensive health care plan, paid vacation, and the opportunity for continued professional development.
